Most peoples of early Europe had contact with vikings as they traded, raided and settled across the continent and beyond. Conventionally vikings have been seen as enemies of the peoples they encountered, and of the Christian church. This symposium presents a broad exploration of ‘viking enemies’ from the traditional to emerging concerns including the construction of ethnic and regional identities and 20th century depictions of vikings.

This symposium will bring together senior academics, post-graduates and early career researchers from a variety of disciplines to discuss the actions and perceptions of vikings and their enemies.

Registration fee from $30 Students, $45 Others (early bird rate)
Registration includes admission to the symposium, morning and afternoon teas, post-symposium drinks and a performance by Scandinavian chorale group ‘On the Verge.’
